SUMMER 2025 NEWSLETTER

Volume XXXV #2

President's Letter Summer 2025

The Society continues to push forward in a day and age when small non-profits are struggling. We have found new and effective ways to share our presence out to the community of Washington County and the greater history community of the region. New uses of various computer applications and programs, while being a learning experience for our staff and volunteers, has also allowed us to increase our outreach, efficiency and productivity. With a grant we received this year, WCHS is excited to begin making use of videography so our members and followers will be able to view our programs online (read more on page 2).

The Wing-Northup House is a beehive of activity these days! Our interactions with visitors and research requests both in-person and online have increased. Since hiring our new administrator, Sarah Hall, we have welcomed several new great volunteers who assist in various ways: answering historical inquiries from researchers; writing historical articles for our quarterly newsletter; developing a new membership application; clerical duties and records management; and working with our American Revolutionary Soldiers project, to name just a few. Passing through Fort Edward, you might also notice that the house has been decorated with a patriotic theme with bunting hung on the picket fence, flowers planted in the yard and a new wreath on the front door. The filing room has taken on the appearance of efficiency. The bookstore inventory is being reorganized and made easier to access. All of this is due to the volunteers under the direction of Sarah Hall. We welcome suggestions for any books on Washington County or regional history that you think would be of interest to our members so we can add them to our inventory. We have seen an increase in researchers online and in-person at the Wing-Northup House. We also continue to reach out to the Washington County history community to join and volunteer, and our programs have been well-attended. Please come visit us on Tuesdays and Wednesdays (open hours 9:30 a.m.- 4:30 p.m.) — it is a very positive atmosphere.

WCHS representatives will again be stationed at the Washington County Farm Museum at this year's County Fair (held the week of August 18-24) helping with the interpretation of Washington County history. Stop by the museum building to chat and network with WCHS board members, volunteers and other members from the Washington County 250th Committee during the event. Visitors will also be able to view replicas of wooden sleds on display created for use in the upcoming Knox Trail reenactment event this December 12-14. BOCES conservation and construction trades classes built these two sleds like the ones Henry Knox used to haul the cannons. The wood was harvested and milled by the BOCES conservation class which included Washington County students. The sleds were then built using hand tools modeled after 18th Century woodworking tools. The Farm Museum is a real asset to the Washington County Fair and to the Washington County community.

Interested in helping to advance the Society's programs? Consider serving on the Board or one of our working committees, help with the building, or ask about many other opportunities of how you can help. Please contact us or feel free to come in and meet our staff and volunteers to find out more. Look for Washington County Historical Society on Facebook and now YouTube and attend our events. Come help tell the story of the great history of Washington County, New York!

Coming Soon—New Ways to Engage with WCHS

WCHS is excited to offer new opportunities to share our programs and engage with our members and the community. We are grateful to have received a grant from the Washington County Home for Aged Women which we have put to good use these past few months. We have purchased a new camera, audio equipment, microphones, computer and other items that will allow WCHS to not only capture our programs, but also to produce programs for our membership.

Beverly Raymond is a professional photographer who has volunteered her time to video our programs, and edit and upload the programs to our new YouTube channel. We are in the process of uploading the content of such programs as Sarah Hall speaking on American Revolutionary Soldiers buried in Washington County; our longtime board member Deb Craig speaking on Susan B. Anthony's life in Washington County; and Saratoga County Vice Historian Anne Clothier presenting on Elizabeth Munro Fisher, a loyalist young woman who joined Burgoyne's Army in 1777. Beverly has also videoed programs presented at the Hartford Recruiting Center on May 29 as part of the Washington County 250th program calendar.

With this additional new equipment, the Washington County Historical Society's offerings will be expanded. The production of future videos on Washington County history and historical figures such as Henry Knox and programs on activities in the Washington County historical community celebrating the 250th Anniversary of the Revolution are already in the works. The YouTube link is <http://www.youtube.com/@WashingtonCountyHistoricalNY>. Check for content uploads soon.

Also in the future, talks by local historians will be presented by Zoom to our members. The combination of having Beverly Raymond using the new equipment as well as training our volunteers and staff will give us exciting new ways to reach out to our membership.

From Haven to Hurdle: Elizabeth Munro Fisher's Life in Hebron

WCHS and Hebron Historical Society hosted a joint program this past May about Elizabeth Munro Fisher, portrayed by Anne Clothier. Following this program, we are pleased to print this article from Emilee N.K. Robbins, sharing some of her research on Loyalist women and especially Elizabeth Munro Fisher, a girl who came to Hebron in her childhood because of her father.

For young Elizabeth Munro Fisher, the Town of Hebron presented both opportunities and obstacles. She lived in Washington County for almost a year, growing quite attached to the quiet and communal way of life. However, as the child of a British military chaplain (and later wife of a British officer), the tensions between British loyalists and patriots became unavoidable and Revolutionary violence inevitable. Like many other loyalists, Fisher fled the colonies to establish a life with her children in Montreal. After the revolution, Fisher eventually returned to America, hoping to reclaim the land in Hebron her father lost. Though well-intentioned, such actions led to a legal battle between herself and her half-brother, Peter Jay Munro. The court case landed Fisher in prison for forgery, a verdict which she vehemently denied. Her time in prison ruined her life — ostracizing her from her community, severing her relationships with her children, and keeping her from any remaining wealth from her father's will.

This story in its entirety is explored in Fisher's self-authored memoir, Memoirs of Mrs. Elizabeth Fisher, of the city of New-York, daughter of the Rev. Harry Munro, who was a chaplain in the British Army, during the American Revolution, published in 1810. I began exploring her story in earnest in the fall of 2022 as I prepared a proposal for my PhD doctoral research. Her memoir was one of three that became the focus of my dissertation, an interdisciplinary study of women's autobiographical works during the American and French Revolutions.

What attracted me to Fisher's narrative was its many twists and turns, turmoil and triumph. It is a story that demonstrates the distinct issues facing loyalist women during the American Revolution and the ways they could adapt to uncertain and dangerous circumstances. And, thus, my obsession with Fisher's memoir began. I tried my best to uncover the many layers of her story, her various movements in North America, and her shifting relationships throughout her life. In the portrayal of her life included in her self-published memoir, Hebron emerges as a site of great significance. Her relationship to the land owned by her father, Harry Munro, serves almost as bookends to her life. Readers see how Hebron came to represent both the place that once offered her a new life before taking that life away.

As a child, Hebron offered an escape from her stepmother, Eve Jay Munro, a woman she claims extensively tortured her in her youth. According to Fisher: "When my father was from home, she would for the least misconduct, whip me, then lock me up in the cellar for a whole day, without giving me either victuals or drink...Often in this situation have I cried myself to sleep" (Memoirs, page 5).

The abuse of Fisher became so harsh, a neighbor informed her father of the mistreatment. At first, Harry attempted to convince his wife to end the treatment. Despite his requests, the maltreatment continued. When a doctor advised Harry to intervene, her father brought Fisher to his land in Hebron. After such abuse, her time in Hebron was a welcome change, a sanctuary from her pain. She wrote that she was "much delighted with this change, being at liberty to range the woods as [she] pleased" (Memoirs, page 7). Fisher loved the land so much that she requested to remain in Hebron when her father left in the winter: "I begged my father to leave me in the country" (Memoirs, page 7). With this plea, her father did allow Fisher to remain, staying with another family in Washington County. Hebron, in these circumstances, was a place of refuge; a place where Fisher could explore the land, enjoy her childhood, and avoid the wrath of her stepmother.

However, at the end of Fisher's memoir, Hebron comes to represent her undoing, the land that led to her imprisonment, ostracization from her family, and social downfall in her community. In 1800, her half-brother, Peter, insisted upon meeting with Fisher to settle the matter of their father's land and deeds upon his death. She wrote that, "he made some proposals to me, which I rejected, thinking he wanted to take advantage of me...he went away much displeased with me" (Memoirs, page 39). The tension between the half siblings led Peter to file a formal complaint in Albany. On October 27th, Fisher was brought to jail before being tried for forgery the following March. According to Fisher, her brother cared little about her well-being:

"his heart was untouched with mercy - I was to be immured in prison for the rest of my days" (Memoirs, page 40). After her release from prison in June 1806, her life was altered forever. While she had friends before her trial, she claimed that she knew no one and had no connections to rely on. Even her children refused to speak to her. When talking about the land once more, she wrote, "What is property? It is only lent, and we must leave it" (Memoirs, page 43). Though Hebron was a source of comfort for Fisher in her youth, it became a stain on her life and the source of great pain and injustice.

Elizabeth Fisher's relationship to Hebron demonstrates the irrevocable impact of the American Revolution. This place that once offered Fisher a way out of her suffering ultimately contributed to her downfall, first a refuge from her mistreatment now a representation of injustice. Though her story is one filled with hardships, Fisher remained resilient. Left behind by her family and friends, she wrote and published her own version of her story, taking charge of her public image. The story she shared helps us further understand the aftermath of revolution. Fisher not only lost her community, belongings, and freedom, but she also lost her former attachment to a place she once loved.

History in the Palm of Your Hand

For the better part of the 20th century, the lowly matchbook was used for cheap advertising for all types of businesses and events. They were easily found in bars, restaurants, banks, service stations and, of course, weddings. You could grab one or a handful from these businesses on your way out.

With the advent of disposable lighters in the 1970s and the later ban of indoor smoking, the matchbook saw a decline in its use as cheap advertising. People have been collecting them for as long as they've been around and, thanks to collectors, we can still remember places that in many cases are no longer in business.

Matchbooks are starting to make a comeback as businesses start to realize they aren't just for lighting a cigarette/cigar and are still a relatively cheap form of advertising.

History of the Washington County Fair

The Washington County Fair has a history, and a very interesting one at that. It all started back around 1883 on the southern end of Lake Lauderdale on the O.C. Valentine farm.

Around 1889, the Cambridge Valley Agricultural Society and Stock Breeders Association was formed. The organization purchased the rights to the fair and moved it to Cambridge. During its time in Cambridge the fair grew exponentially and began to draw crowds from many area communities.

Not only did the fair benefit from its relocation, so did the village of Cambridge, and likewise its railroad business. Already a railroad hub before the popularity of private automobiles, the Delaware and Hudson Railroad began to offer round trips to the fair for $3 from such communities as Granville, Fort Ann and Fort Edward. The out-of-towners sometimes came from as far away as Troy, which had a regular daily connection to Cambridge during that era.

The popularity of the fair at the Cambridge site was due in part to the fact that it included 40 acres of land, stables for up to 200 hundred horses, a half-mile racetrack, a grandstand that seated 2,500 people, and seven acres of buildings. A major boost occurred in 1929, when electrical service was installed.

According to historian Ken Gottry, crowds of 30,000 to 40,000 people were common at the fair in the first half of the 1900s. Admission to the fair was 25 cents, with a grandstand seat costing $1.50 and a box seat $3. Gottry also noted along the midway there were side shows, games, fortune tellers, eateries, souvenir stands, a merry-go-round and a Ferris Wheel. The exhibit halls held fruit, vegetables, needlework, preserves and baked goods. At one point, the fair was considered to be the largest poultry show in the country.

The fair fell on hard times during World War II, when it was closed and ultimately went bankrupt. The fair rebounded, however, and in 1954 the Cambridge Valley Agricultural Society and the Washington County Junior Fair joined forces to bring the fair back to life and moved it to the intersections of NYS Routes 29 and 40 in Greenwich, the site of the present Hannaford supermarket.

The boards of directors of the two organizations, still separate but working together, purchased at 25-acre lot at the intersection of NYS Route 29 and Old Schuylerville Road in 1961, moving the fair to its current location.

The 1960s and '70s saw a dramatic expansion of the fairgrounds, which allowed the event to become the spectacle it is today. In particular, there was the purchase of a 43-acre parcel in 1967, with a dormitory added four years later to supply housing for the large number of children involved with such organizations as 4-H and the Future Farmers of America (FFA). This time period also saw many different events and attractions come and go, including the short-lived pony races.

In 1991, the Cambridge Valley Agricultural Society and the Washington County Junior Fair's board of directors merged into one 32-member volunteer board and changes its name to simply the Washington County Fair, Inc., a moniker that remains today.

The year 1999 saw the construction of the agricultural center and in 2008 another 40 acres were purchased to add to the parking area and allow for further expansion.

Currently the fairgrounds encompass 120 acres and has become the largest tourist attraction in Washington County, annually drawing 120,000 visitors or more a year. The 2025 edition of the fair runs from Aug. 18-24, with general admission priced at $15. A full week's pass costs $45. Tuesday is Veterans Day, with all vets admitted for $7. Thursday is children's and military day, with school-aged children and all active military admitted free. Parking is also free.
